

Opting Out of State Standardized Tests

A fact sheet from
Citizens for Public Schools

What is “opting out”?

It means refusing to take a standardized test such as PARCC or MCAS.

Why should I opt my student out?

To protect your child: For many students, the Big Test can be very stressful.

To improve education for all students: Opting out is an effective way to protest the overuse and misuse of standardized tests, which forces schools to focus on the demands of the tests instead of the needs of students. Test obsession eats up classroom time, narrows curriculum, destroys children’s love of learning, and fuels the school-to-prison pipeline.

The opt-out movement has led to changes in state and local testing policies in other states. It can work here, too.

Is opting out illegal?

No. State law says the Department of Elementary and Secondary Education must give tests to all students. But the law does not say every student must take those tests and it does not provide for any penalties to students who refuse, or their parents.

What will my child do while the tests are administered?

State officials have told schools that if a student refuses the test, they should be allowed to read or do homework.

Will opting out affect my child’s academic standing?

Passing the state high school tests is a requirement for a high school diploma. But there is no state penalty for students who opt out in grades 3 – 8. Some schools use the scores in choosing students for advanced work, but most do not. Check whether your school does. Email lesstestingmorelearning@gmail.com if you have questions.

Will opting out cause my student’s school to lose funding?

No. Parents have been told this, but it has never happened. Last year, 240,000 New York State students opted out, at least 20%; many districts had far higher percentages. No New York school district lost any money. Federal officials did warn 12 states with high opt-out rates that if it happens again, they could lose a small amount of federal funds that pay for state administrative expenses. Massachusetts was not one of the 12.

Will opting out hurt my school and school district?

Last year, some officials told parents that opting out could hurt their school's state rating. "Level 1" requires 95% test participation. "Level 2" requires 90%.

However, most schools are administering PARCC this spring. The state has pledged not to lower any school's rating if it gives PARCC. (Read this promise at <http://bit.ly/harmlesspromise>.) The only exception: The Massachusetts Education Commissioner can still put a school in level 5, in which the state takes control. If your school is not currently at level 4 ("turnaround"), it does not face this danger.

How can I opt out my child?

Send the principal a letter saying you do not want your child to take the state test. It can be as basic as this:

"Dear —, I have asked my child, [name], not to take part in the [name the exam] this year. Please arrange for [him or her] to have a productive educational experience during the testing period."

Last year, many parents' opt-out letters were honored, but just in case, you may also want to send your child to school with a note to read to the test proctor, something like this: "My parent told me not to take this test." Or print that message on a sticker your child can wear on clothing. There's a model sticker at <http://bit.ly/1L8rfDF>

A 2016 memo from Education Commissioner Mitchell Chester says, "We ask principals and test proctors to handle refusals with sensitivity. Students should not be pressured to take the test, nor should they be punished for not taking the test." The memo is at <http://bit.ly/refusethetest>.

How can I make my action have real impact?

One parent quietly opting out will not stop high-stakes testing. It's important to join with other parents and let people know what you are doing and why. Tell your newspaper, parent organizations, school committee, and legislators. Use parent email networks.

Citizensforpublicschools.org links to more materials about opting out and the Less Testing, More Learning campaign. Please keep us informed of what you are doing. Email lesstestingmorelearning@gmail.com. We will not release any information without your direct permission.

Citizens for Public Schools
Parents, teachers, and other Massachusetts residents working to improve public education for all children.
Visit us at www.citizensforpublicschools.org.

